Our webpage was a landing page for information about the band Deftones, including their various albums. The project consists of four main parts: the navbar, introduction section, body sections, and the footer with a form. I was tasked with the navbar, main body element, and cleaning up the code structures. Simultaneously, Ayman inputted the information about the band, worked on the introduction section, and created the footer. The design plans initially called for background videos and images but were discarded due to the lack of visibility when reading text content due to the disruptive nature of the backgrounds.

For the code, the structure of the main contents was a copy-and-paste repeated structure of a span element containing the text content (heading and paragraph) and a corresponding image that alternates the left and right sides of the six main sections. The navbar was the most intricate design that contained glyph icons imported through a bootstrap, animated search bar, and hover effects. Additionally, we twisted the criteria of “6 facts” to more of a descriptive context about the band’s album, as it was far more interesting to cover the music produced by the band. Overall, the product went smoothly and quickly where one person added content, and the other was assigned to code cleanup with the git commits coordinated over voice call to prevent conflicts.
